(b) Write precis of the following passage and give suitable title—

If a university is to participate in what may fittingly be called the Indian renaissance, it must pay adequate attention to the study of India's past. This land of ours is no sandbank thrown up by some recent caprice of earth. It is a stately growth with roots strikingly deep through the centuries. Nations have history as well as geography. They live and grow not by the force of wind and rain, sun and stars, but by the passions and ideas which animate them. The university must stimulate an interest in the sources of civilization, its art and thought, its language and literature, its philosophy and religion. Anyone who has studied and mediated on the ancient classics of this country will testify to their peculiar greatness, their power to yield new meaning and their inexhaustible value as a criterion of present-day modes of life. In these days of startling scientific development, it may not be useless to point out that reconstructing the mosaic of the long forgotten past, is not a less ennobling performance on the part of the human mind that calculating movement of stars or making ships fly in the air.
